To anyone in the business of trading stocks, tiny changes in price make an enormous difference. The same is true of small differences in trading rules. This week, America's brokers and exchanges are in a uproar over proposed trading rules being considered by the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC). An alteration to the proposal would encourage stock markets to disclose more bid and offer prices, and thus in effect oblige brokers to look through different markets for all prices, not just the best ones, when they are filling orders. This, say some, could spell doom for floor trading on the New York Stock Exchange (NYSE). The SEC is likely to vote on the proposals, which were first set out in February 2004, at the end of December. But they are still in flux, and the SEC has not published the latest stand (as it was reported by The Wall Street Journal on November 22nd). Many officials in the trading world are clamouring for formal publication of the changes and for a delay in the vote in order to allow more public comment. The cause of the agitation is known as the "trade through" rule. This obliges markets to ensure that customers get the best price rather than simply the fastest execution. Currently it applies to the NYSE and the American Stock Exchange. The SEC's proposal aims to extend it to other markets, and seeks to ensure that quotes be available electronically in order to be considered as a possible best price. Customers may be able to opt if they value speed above price.
